It is not a web-app but only contains a web-view and an iframe. The web-app is loaded in a WebView as an android web-app. So the question is: When the mobile back button is pressed, will the browser return to the previous web-app or the current web-app? If it returns to the previous web-app, then the iframe and its children will be loaded again, and the user will have to scroll down again to the top. A: If you use the WebView as an app instead of a web page, the onBackPressed() will always return to your app. So it will always return to the same state. This invention relates to backings for food articles and more particularly to the use of gelatinous substances as a binder to hold the food articles in position on such backings. Prior food product backings employed food-grade plastics in general and the most common such material is polyvinylchloride. When used in thick, rigid sheet form, it has been found to be useful for holding food products such as potato chips, bread products, crackers and the like in position on a surface
